The card has been distributed among 4.9 million families in all 36 districts of Punjab

DNA

ISLAMABAD: Special Assistant to the Prime Minister on Political Affairs Shahbaz Gill has on Friday said that Pakistan Muslim League-Nawaz (PML-N) has lost the trust of people.

Reacting to PML-N spokesperson Marriyum Aurangzeb's statement, Shahbaz Gill said that it is ridiculous that the party which paralyzed the health system is now commenting on the issue. PML-N should at least stop giving lecture on the health subject, he said.

"Those who governed for decades could not even make a single hospital in which they could get medical treatment themselves. Funds for the health sector were used in the Orange Line project. "PML-N President committed embezzlements in welfare projects. Those who misused the aid collected for earthquake victims became a cause of embarrassment for Pakistan at international level.

"Fixing Rs 208 billion for the Ehsaas Programme is a representation of the incumbent government's welfare approach. Distribution of the Sehat Insaf Card is also an indication regarding the government's priority towards the health sector. "The card has been distributed among 4.9 million families in all 36 districts of Punjab. It is the first project in Pakistan's history which will provide free health facilities to the entire Khyber Pakhtunkhwa.

Meanwhile, Prime Minister Imran Khan on Thursday admitted that letting former PM Nawaz Sharif leave the country was a "mistake" by his government. Citing Khan's interview on Thursday, media reported that the Prime Minister hinted that the government was pressurised into sending Nawaz Sharif abroad, saying that the reports presented to the government suggested that the PML-N supremo was severely ill.

Sharif, who has been convicted for corruption, had left for the UK in November last year for medical treatment. Khan further said the federal cabinet had held hours of debate over whether the government should let Sharif leave on humanitarian grounds.

Reopening tourism

PRIME MINISTER Imran Khan's interest in promoting tourism in the country has culminated in the formation of the National Coordination Committee for Tourism, which is going to be run by Special Assistant Zulfikar Bukhari as its convener. Mr Bukhari will be briefing Mr Khan every fortnight, which shows the high priority the prime minister attaches to this sector. The committee will implement a national tourism strategy. The ultimate long-term economic benefit of setting up a robust tourism industry is to generate revenue and jobs – an objective that has been greeted with some scepticism as resources are hard to come by and so far little has been done to tap the industry's potential. But there is no shortage of enthusiasm either. Experts have concurred with official projections regarding the country's treasures by coming up with their own positive assessments. There is a certain vibrancy to Pakistanis' urge to travel within the country. The increasing number of domestic tourists who set out on pleasure trips to famous holiday destinations, especially in the north and northwest of the country during summer, testifies to this. In fact, some spots are chock-a-block with people during summer, leading to calls for greater regulation and the promotion of less-crowded resorts. More systematic, reassuring handling of operations would boost tourist confidence and lift the industry as a whole. Once the infrastructure is created, some bold decision-making would be required to woo the average foreign tourist to Pakistan. Having said that, there are some issues that need urgent attention. In the recent past, the government came under attack for doing away with the staff and structure of the Pakistan Tourism Development Corporation. The need to create an alternative is an immense challenge. Then there are health issues. Pakistan is certainly fortunate in having been less affected by the coronavirus as compared to other countries. But the health emergency is certainly not over. For instance, the Mansehra district administration recently sealed hotels after several staff members tested positive for the virus. They were reopened later after the premises was disinfected, but overall, popular vacation spots have seen a rise in Covid-19 cases, with tourists being blamed for not observing SOPs. This is a point of concern as holiday destinations are vulnerable to the virus. What is positive is the fact that thousands are waiting to get away from their dreary daily drill. After the pandemic, they should be facilitated in every way possible.

The peace process

ALMOST as important as it is for Afghanistan, the peace process in that country is crucial to Pakistan, its stability and its future. Pakistan has played an active role in facilitating the peace process by acting as mediators between the Taliban and the US. Islamabad now faces the equally difficult task of bringing together an Afghan government the legitimacy of which the Taliban have refused to accept. Foreign Minister Shah Mahmood Qureshi as a part of this process met a visiting delegation of the Taliban in Islamabad on Wednesday. The effort to negotiate a settlement between the Taliban and the Afghan government of President Ashraf Ghani has run into some problems essentially over the release of prisoners the Taliban want out of jail. The US meanwhile is eager to pull out as many troops as possible from Afghanistan by November this year, possibly leaving only a few thousand in place. For Afghanistan, however, the question is whether the weak security forces managed by the Afghan government can control the Taliban, various warlords struggling for power and outside elements such as the IS and Al-Qaeda to whom the Taliban have promised to give no space. Whether this promise is kept is uncertain. The delegation representing the Afghan government is also likely to visit Pakistan over the coming weeks, possibly in about a month. Pakistan has the difficult task of finding a way to broker a settlement between these two forces. Washington already appears to have lost interest in the country after reducing it to its present plight and is interested mainly in making an exit. It is far from certain what shape Afghanistan will take in the coming months. But what unfolds in that country will be critical to the region. Shah Mahmood has said he recognizes that Afghanistan must solve its own problems. Pakistan however is willing to offer as much help as is possible. This will of course benefit Pakistan as much as Afghanistan. It is also vital that Islamabad and Kabul create a strong working relationship given that the issues they face are very similar and are interlinked in many different ways. These issues can be unraveled only if both nations work together and try to evolve a relationship that will serve them well over the coming years so that the current tensions can be wiped out and the people of Afghanistan can gain a respite from unending conflict.

Need for bold initiative for resolving Kashmir conflict

Iqbal Khan

Pakistan has apprised all international forums about atrocities by Indian security forces, including but not limited to: extra-judicial killings, use of rape as weapon to suppress the peaceful struggle by Kashmiris for their right of self-determination, firing at innocent civilians, protracted detentions without trial, and violence against non-combatants including women and children. This environment has indeed evolved into a new normal in occupied Jammu & Kashmir. Responding to a question from a reporter, Bozkir said, "Position of the UN on this region is governed by its charter and applicable Security Council resolutions as was previously expressed by the UN Security Council on different occasions"

INDIA'S contentions about Jammu and Kashmir being the so-called "integral and inalienable part" of India and an "internal affair" do not go beyond side-splitting fiction, which stands contrary to historical and legal facts and in violation of the relevant United Nations Security Council (UNSC) Resolutions. India must, at the earliest, vacate its illegal and forcible occupation of Indian Illegally Occupied Jammu and Kashmir (IIOJK) and let the Kashmiris exercise their inalienable right to self-determination through a free and impartial plebiscite under the auspices of the United Nations as enshrined in the relevant UNSC Resolutions. With each passing day more and more voices are being added to the necessity of resolution of Kashmir dispute at the earliest. Yet, these are well short of the critical mass to impact Indian attitude and behaviour. India had scrapped the special status of IIOJK under Articles 370 and 35A of its constitution on August 5 last year in violation of UN Security Council resolutions and international law. US presidential hopeful Joe Biden has once again expressed concern over the deteriorating situation in Jammu and Kashmir, saying restrictions on dissent, such as preventing peaceful protests or shutting down the internet, weakens democracy. Biden called on the Indian government to "take all necessary steps to restore rights for all the people of Kashmir". Though statements by the US presidential hopefuls cannot be taken on face value, Biden, having done two Vice Presidential tenures, is expected to make measured statements on Kashmir—beyond wooing Muslim voters. Through his recently published paper, "Diplomacy in South Asia: a four step grand plan for Kashmir" Dr Claude Rakisits, has proposed a bold, four-step plan which would address the question of self-determination for Kashmiris. Two important elements of this plan are: the involvement of the Commonwealth Eminent Persons Group to assist Kashmiris, Pakistan and India in the mediation of the plan; and, the holding of four UN-supervised referenda which would be held simultaneously but counted separately for Gilgit-Baltistan and Azad Kashmir; Kashmir valley; Jammu; and Ladakh. All Kashmiris would have three options: Join Pakistan, Join India or independence. As an incentive to India and Pakistan, the international community would deliver substantial economic assistance for the development of all parts of Kashmir. But as a quid pro quo for the economic aid package, there would have to be guaranteed free movement of people, capital and goods between all parts of Kashmir after the referenda, regardless as to which option had been chosen by the Kashmiris. While meeting with the United Nations General Assembly President-elect Volkan Bozkir on August 10, Prime Minister Imran Khan urged the United Nations to play its role in addressing the "grave" situation in Indian occupied Kashmir and to ensure that the people of the valley exercise their right to self-determination as promised under the UN Security Council (UNSC) resolutions. Kashmir is an issue that has been on the UNSC agenda for over seven decades. "The prime minister highlighted the dire rights and humanitarian situation in occupied Kashmir since August 5, 2019, as well as the ongoing gross and systematic violations of human rights and attempts to change the demographic structure of the occupied territory." PM Imran expressed the hope that the 75th Session of the UNGA would accord priority to this issue. The UNGA president-elect also met with Foreign Minister Shah Mahmood Qureshi at the Foreign Office where the latter sought "effective role of the UNGA to end human rights violations in occupied Kashmir." FM briefed him about the evolving situation of IIOJK facing military siege for the last one year, human rights violations, and illegal search and cordon operations. Pakistan has apprised all international forums about atrocities by Indian security forces, including but not limited to: extra-judicial killings, use of rape as weapon to suppress the peaceful struggle by Kashmiris for their right of self-determination, firing at innocent civilians, protracted detentions without trial, and violence against non-combatants including women and children. This environment has indeed evolved into a new normal in occupied Jammu & Kashmir. Responding to a question from a reporter, Bozkir said, "Position of the UN on this region is governed by its charter and applicable Security Council resolutions as was previously expressed by the UN secretary General on different occasions." He stated that solving the Kashmir issue was key to sustainable peace in South Asia. "Regional security should be maintained through political and diplomatic solutions. Difficult challenges can be resolved through meaningful, mutual engagement." "So if my assistance as the president of the General Assembly is requested by the parties, I will be ready to provide contributions within my mandate." Expressing his strong support for the longstanding dispute of Jammu and Kashmir, Bozkir linked it with peace and stability of the South Asian region. "The Jammu and Kashmir dispute needs to be settled through peaceful means," he said. The "meaningful engagement of political and diplomatic channels" is significant to resolve the issue in accordance with the resolutions of UN Security Council, he added. Bozkir said Turkey's position on Jammu and Kashmir is well-known and its foreign ministry had issued a strong statement over India's action of August 5, 2019. The international community must play its role in bringing an end to the brutality in Indian Occupied Kashmir. Human rights organizations need to raise their voices, more forcefully, against India's barbaric acts particularly against women and children, who continue to face the wrath of Indian atrocities since the last seventy years. Pakistan will continue to lend moral, political and diplomatic support to Kashmir at all international fora. There are numerous UN Security Council resolutions under which the people of Kashmir have been promised the right to self-determination through a UN-mandated plebiscite. India and Pakistan need to resume dialogue to arrive at a political solution to the satisfaction of the Kashmiri people. According to Claude, "Bearing in mind the long history of political tension in Jammu and Kashmir, compounded by recent developments, it's obvious the present situation in Kashmir cannot continue and will quite possibly get worse". "India has always argued that Kashmir is a domestic issue and external interference will not be accepted. But however much the Indian government would like it to be the case, Kashmir is today very much in the international public domain". Over the last one year, there have been numerous short lived bursts of support from various quarters of international community, but things have not moved beyond lip service. Even at official level, the foreign office went into a sort of hibernation after Prime Minister Imran Khan's speech to the UNGA, as if speech itself was the end objective. Also, some of the allies—so called brotherly countries of the Middle East have been pressuring Pakistan to abandon the Kashmir cause. The Organisation of Islamic Cooperation (OIC), did make some noises, but nothing beyond that. The regurgitation of false claims by India can neither change facts nor divert attention from India's state-terrorism in the IIOJK, and its egregious violations of human rights of the Kashmiri people. Rather than resorting to false and misleading assertions, India should faithfully implement its international obligations. — Writer is a freelance contributor, email: Iqbal.khan9999@yahoo.com

Governments must wake up to the global warming threat

Ranvir S. Nayar

Both governments and businesses try to hide behind schemes such as compensatory afforestation, which is the process of introducing trees to areas not previously forested, plantations or more recent fads such as urban forests, as if they are adequate solutions to the global problem of increasingly few trees

LAST month Greenpeace International said that since the start of this year, fires in Siberia have destroyed nearly 21 million hectares of virgin forest. But it is not only Siberia that is going up in flames. With other major fires reported in Greenland, Alaska and northern Canada, the entire Arctic region has been burning at record levels, exacerbating the problems caused by global warming and climate change. Extensive fires have also been reported in the Amazon basin, Europe and Asia. The full scale of the damage caused by forest fires this year obviously will not be known for another five months but we do know that in 2019 the amount of global virgin forest lost was about 2.8 percent higher than the previous year, and the annual loss rate has remained high for the past two decades, despite efforts to curb deforestation. The Earth is already paying a heavy price for the loss of forests, especially primary forests, which are many thousands of years old. For one thing, burning trees release a lot of carbon into air and these emissions have been rising sharply for several years. In 2019, 7.8 billion tons of carbon was emitted. This was 26 percent more than in 2018 and represented about 21 percent of the year's total carbon emissions. In addition to releasing significant amounts of carbon while actively burning, forest fires have a longer-term negative effect. The soot from burning wood that ends up in the air absorbs sunlight and warms the globe more. And when the soot settles on ice or snow, or falls on it in raindrops, it becomes trapped, reducing the reflectivity of the ice and snow. As a result, more heat is trapped and the ice melts faster. Not only do burning forests create a lot of carbon and lead to increased melting of ice, they also affect global carbon emissions in another, very significant way. Forests are immense carbon sinks that capture the element from the atmosphere and store it. Approximately 2.6 billion tons of carbon dioxide, which is one-third of the annual amount released by burning fossil fuels, is absorbed by forests every year. The world's forests currently store 300 billion tons of carbon, which is 30 times the global annual emissions from fossil fuels. Scientists say that if 2 billion hectares of degraded land around the world was restored and diverse forests replanted, they could fully neutralize global carbon emissions from fossil fuels. As well as delaying or even preventing global warming, forests also promote ecology in another significant way. Most of the world's oldest forests are among the richest repositories of biodiversity, both flora and fauna. They provide canopies that benefit birds, cavities that provide nesting places for animals, and dead trees that become homes for insects, reptiles and amphibians, while the moisture they create feeds lichen and mosses that also are habitats for insects. Each of these living creatures plays a crucial role in maintaining the ecological balance. When millions of square kilometers of ancient forests go up in flames each year, it causes irreplaceable damage to global biodiversity that is already under severe pressure. Forests are not only home to animals, insects and plants, they are also the habitat for hundreds of millions of human beings, the vast majority of whom are extremely poor and live on the edge of societies. The livelihoods of about 1.6 billion people, 23 percent of the world's population, depend on forests, mainly old forests, as these people are foragers who gather fruits and other forest produce. More than 80 percent of virgin forests in the world have already been lost to industrial logging, and the remaining 20 percent is under unprecedented pressure as a result of global warming, fires and ever-increasing logging activity that seems to continue with little oversight, even in this age of greater awareness about the need to preserve the environment and ecological balance. Despite the alarm bells that are ringing all around the world, governments and businesses seem to be continuing on the path to destruction with blinkers on. Industrial logging is thriving and has now reached areas that were once no-go areas, including areas deep in Africa, the Arctic Circle, the Himalayas and parts of central India that are home to forests that are millions of years old. Both governments and businesses try to hide behind schemes such as compensatory afforestation, which is the process of introducing trees to areas not previously forested, plantations or more recent fads such as urban forests, as if they are adequate solutions to the global problem of increasingly few trees. While these measures might help to restore some degraded lands or replace a few trees, they are in no way effective replacements for virgin forests. It is time that leaders around the world understood and recognized that the first and most significant measure that must be taken to prevent a global environmental catastrophe is to protect the biodiversity hot spots provided by older forests. Last year, the UN warned that more than a million plant and animal species are threatened with extinction, 75 percent of agricultural genetic biodiversity has been lost, as has 70 percent of fishery diversity, and that the unprecedented forest fires that have only been getting worse over the past two decades threaten to push many of these threatened species to the very edge of extinction. The only possible way to prevent, or at least delay, this catastrophe is for governments to take a more serious and urgent view of the situation, and for businesses to consider the potential long-term profits that would come from preventing the meltdown of planet Earth. So far, the signs of either of these things happening have been anything but hopeful. — Courtesy: Arab News

Shinzo Abe: Japan’s PM to resign for health reasons

In 2007 he resigned abruptly from an earlier term as prime minister because of his struggles with ulcerative colitis, a chronic condition affecting the large intestine, that he has lived with since he was a teenager

DNA

TOKYO: Japanese PM Shinzo Abe has resigned for health reasons. He has suffered for many years from ulcerative colitis, an inflammatory bowel disease, but his condition is thought to have worsened recently. Public broadcaster NHK said the 65-year-old wanted to avoid causing problems for his government. Last year, he became Japan’s longest serving prime minister. His current period in office began in 2012. In 2007 he resigned abruptly from an earlier term as prime minister because of his struggles with ulcerative colitis, a chronic condition affecting the large intestine, that he has lived with since he was a teenager. Mr Abe has a reputation as a staunch conservative and nationalist, and for stimulating growth with his aggressive economic policy known as “Abenomics”. He has strengthened Japan’s defences and boosted military spending, but has been unable to revise the constitution’s pacifist Article 9, which bans a standing army for anything other than self-defence. Prime Minister Abe has long suffered from chronic ulcerative colitis. The disease forced him to resign in 2007 - the first time he headed the government. Now, after weeks of speculation about him being absent from the public eye despite a worrying uptick in Japan’s coronavirus cases, it seems he is resigning yet again due to the same illness. As the longest-serving Japanese prime minister, he leaves behind a legacy of stability and a strong centralised power base that allowed forceful stimulus policies to revive the economy. He also improved relations with the US by courting President Donald Trump, often on the golf course.

Yet his government was also mired in scandal, including talk of favouritism and willful destruction of public records. When the pandemic struck, his responses were often criticised as being slow, ineffective, and out of touch. And perhaps importantly for Mr Abe, his cherished - and highly controversial - wish to revise Japan’s pacifist constitution under his watch, has come to naught, at least for now.

Two hospital visits in one week sparked questions about whether Mr Abe’s health was deteriorating. He had been due to serve until September 2021. He has not revealed what the visits were for but one is reported to have lasted nearly eight hours. LDP officials have previously dismissed speculation that he would step down, saying the prime minister’s health was fine. At the Rio de Janeiro Olympics in 2016 Mr Abe appeared as video game character Mario Akira Amari, head of the LDP’s tax panel, dismissed the suggestion that the prime minister would dissolve parliament’s lower house for a snap general election soon. “There won’t be a snap election for the time being,” he said. Still, rumours have persisted about Mr Abe’s growing fatigue as he fields growing scrutiny for his handling of the coronavirus pandemic, at a time when approval ratings for his cabinet have dropped.

Under Japanese law, an acting prime minister would step in temporarily if Mr Abe were unable to perform his role, with no limits on how long they can stay in post. Deputy Prime Minister Taro Aso, who is also finance minister, is first in line, followed by Chief Cabinet Secretary Yoshihide Suga. An acting prime minister cannot call a snap election but they lead on other matters such as treaties and budgets until a new party leader and premier is chosen.

Trump warns Biden will ‘demolish’ American dream

DNA

WASHINGTON: US President Donald Trump has warned his Democratic challenger Joe Biden will “demolish” the American dream if he wins the White House in November. Speaking on the final night of the Republican convention, the president depicted his opponent as “the destroyer of American greatness”. He said the Democrats would unleash “violent anarchists” upon US cities.

On Thursday night, the president asked voters for another four years in office, vowing to dispel the coronavirus pandemic that has ravaged the US economy and quell civil strife ignited by police killings of African Americans. Mr Trump accepted his party’s renomination from the South Lawn of the White House. “This election will decide whether we save the American dream,” he said, “or whether we allow a socialist agenda to demolish our cherished destiny.” He added: “Your vote will decide whether we protect law-abiding Americans, or whether we give free rein to violent anarchists, agitators and criminals who threaten our citizens.” While Mr Trump portrayed his challenger as “a Trojan horse for socialism”, Mr Biden’s lengthy record as a political moderate was a hindrance for him as he competed to capture his party’s nomination.

New geologic system under creation in Uzbekistan

Four resolutions have been signed by the President on these issues. Toward their execution, the industry is undergoing modernization and digitalization, prospecting works are growing in scale and efficiency

DNA

TASHKENT: On August 27, President of the Republic of Uzbekistan Shavkat Mirziyoyev was presented report on the effectiveness of works in the geology sector. In his Address to the Oliy Majlis in January this year, the Head of the state noted that certain fields of science would be attached priority significance every year to secure their advanced development. This year, geology was identified as one of such. Four resolutions have been signed by the President on these issues. Toward their execution, the industry is undergoing modernization and digitalization, prospecting works are growing in scale and efficiency. “New geologic system is being created in Uzbekistan. The purpose sought is to cash in the natural resources for the good of the nation, create jobs and improve the wellbeing of people”, Shavkat Mirziyoyev said. Foundation has been instituted for the revival of geology as science and training modern specialists. In particular, the University of Geological Science has been established to unite four research institutions. Cutting-edge drilling and laboratory equipment was procured. As a result, the drilling works’ productivity have increased by quarter compared to the same period last year. In addition, the number of elements discovered in ore has grown from 40 to 63. From the beginning of this year, 150 new deposits have been registered. The resources and reserves of gold, silver, uranium and copper are enhancing. 3 new gold deposits are discovered in Kuljuktai and Auminzatau mountains in Bukhara and Navoi regions, along with 2 uranium ones in Kattakurgan district of Samarkand region and Arnasay district of Jizzakh region. Moreover, mining and geological data on 32 types of reserves have been transferred to JORC international standards. Within the framework of efforts designed to develop the agricultural sector, geological research based on express methods has been conducted on 155 thousand hectares of lands. Water reserves with 90 thousand cubic meters extraction a day have been confirmed in water-scarcity districts.

Chairman of the State Committee on Geology and Mineral Resources presented report to the President. The attraction of foreign investments towards the development of 20 new deposits was discussed during the presentation, through open and transparent procedures, by holding online bids. Instructions were given on public-private partnership in this sphere. Next measures directed at uplifting the effectiveness of works in the sector, strengthening its normative base and boosting the investment potential were discussed. The Head of the state gave concrete instructions to double the scale of geological prospecting next year, discover new prospective fields, accelerate the introduction of state-of-the-art laboratory equipment. The State Committee on Geology and Mineral Resources has been tasked with the establishment of new prospecting on new fields based on cooperation, further expand the practice of transferring works on development of discovered deposits to the private sector. The need was noted for establishing, on the Namangan experience, constant geological expeditions, especially of hydrogeological designation, in every region. Tasks were defined to elevate the effectiveness in the exploitation of underground soils granted for use and promote research works. Officials in charge of the sphere were tasked to devise a roadmap for the implementation of the measures identified.
