Moroccan King for unity among African nations

Ambassador of Morocco Mohammed Karmoune says, Morocco's public health sector might not be as advanced as Japan's for instance, however, this safety-preparedness approach is not only a winning strategy, but also unprecedented for majority of MENA countries, and even for some European countries

EXCLUSIVE

ANSAR M BHATTI

ISLAMABAD: King Mohammed VI has called for unity on African leaders to deal with the Covid-19 pandemic. He spoke on this matter with the presidents of Côte d'Ivoire and Senegal, to launch an initiative of African Heads of State aimed at establishing an operational framework to support the countries of the continent in their different phases of pandemic management. Ambassador of Morocco Mohammed Karmoune disclosed this in an interview with Daily Islamabad POST. His detailed interview shall be published in the November issue of CENTRELINE magazine.

He further told that Morocco also donated to the African Union Commission medical supplies that would boost the continental capacity to respond to the COVID-19 pandemic. The donation represents the values of support and solidarity between African Union Member States.

Concretely, the Kingdom of Morocco quickly went from words to deeds. Since Sunday, June 14, the cargo planes of the airline Royal Air Maroc are active again on the tarmacs of African airports. In the wake of his commitment made in April 2020 to strengthen South-South solidarity, King Mohammed VI ordered the dispatch of medical aid to 15 sub-Saharan countries, with massive help: 8 million masks, 900,000 visors,

600,000 charlottes, 60,000 gowns, 30,000 liters of hydroalcoholic gel, 75,000 boxes of chloroquine and 15,000 boxes of azithromycin, all from Moroccan factories in accordance with the standards required by the WHO. The measures taken by Morocco at the first stage of the COVID-19 outbreak is showing how much Morocco did not underestimate the situation and learned from other countries' mistakes. In comparison to the majority of African countries, Morocco's strong institutions, peaceful society, robust infrastructure, and several achievements on food security, have definitely helped policy-makers to draw a prompt response to exacerbate the Coronavirus panic, and dismiss spurious information around it.

The ambassador further said, Morocco's public health sector might not be as sophisticated as Japan's for instance, however, this safety-preparedness approach is not only a winning strategy, but it is also unprecedented for the majority of MENA countries, and even for some European countries.

"Despite the fragile economic situation Morocco faced before the pandemic, the actions taken by the Government and all the other institutions show it is among the first countries globally to sacrifice its own economic welfare to prevent this virus from spreading." "This move, in turn, has inspired Moroccans to trust the Government's measures and help one another in this time of crisis.

"The Coronavirus situation shows the societal benefits of cohesion and solidarity with one another and shows how it is important to consider the positives of this difficult period, rather than just the negatives."

Compensation package

THE fire in Hafeez Centre, Lahore earlier this month sent shockwaves through the trading community. The plaza was the go-to place for all technology-related needs of the provincial capital. The damage from the flames was spread out over an estimated 500 different shops, but most of those retailers in the centre had expensive stock stored at the plaza, ranging from top-of-the-line phones and computers to everything else related to tech that is currently available in Pakistan.

Luckily, Chief Minister Punjab has announced that a compensation package worth Rs5 billion will be provided to those affected. This does not exactly cover the losses faced by the shopkeepers at Hafeez Centre, but is a good start nonetheless. It is important for the government to look to facilitate traders where possible, because a good business environment keeps the economy running.

The government quite clearly realises that the fire in Hafeez Centre did not only destroy the livelihoods of shopkeepers, but it also took away an important revenue destination for the government; the daily volume of sales in Hafeez Centre entailed that the government was always benefitting from the purchases made by retailers; especially in the current climate where taxes on all commodities and imports are extremely high. Beyond compensation, the government must also look towards a rebuild and provide the space for traders to set up shop once more. Whether it is a renovated version of Hafeez Centre or any of the surrounding plazas, one thing that is clear is that there needs to be more awareness about fire safety. Anyone that has visited the centre is acutely aware of how hotch-potch wiring and tight corridors with makeshift setups were an accident waiting to happen. It was only a matter of time before something short circuited. We were fortunate that no lives were lost this time. It is hoped that we learn from this and adhere to better fire safety practices in the future.

Although the number of cases and fatalities because of the Covid-19 were not as severe as that in the UK or the USA, still the business operations were halted and precious lives were lost. Now as the second wave of the Covid-19 is surfacing, especially in the winter season when viruses and bacteria spread aggressively, policy measures must be implemented. The National Command and Operations Centre has recently issued directives for restaurants, commercial markers, shopping malls, and wedding halls operating in several cities to shut down before or by 10 pm. Recreational spots are asked to shut down by 6 pm. This initiative must be implemented across the board, across all cities, in letter and spirit. Although Pakistan did survive the initial phase of the Covid-19 attack, the second phase, as doctors predict, could be stronger than before. The national policy to withstand this virus should also include a holistic approach to wear masks, carry sanitizers and use them when in public, and to maintain social distance with each other. Unnecessary traveling must be avoided. Children and senior citizens need to follow all precautionary steps with assertiveness. In this regard, educational institutes should continue following the hybrid model of education where some students attend classes on campus while the rest attend online classes. In the case of another lockdown, the educational institutes can continue conducting a hundred percent online classes now that such a mechanism has been implemented. Furthermore, every individual needs to ascertain that the SOPs in their homes are being followed. In offices, all employees must ensure following such protocols. During uncertain times, we need to remain proactive, cautious, and vigilant under any circumstances. The world has gone through the chaos that Covid-19 created when it first broke out. We can fight against it and defeat the pandemic by implementing logical preventive measures.

For future prosperity, Afghanistan must look north

Luke Coffey

Thankfully, there is a growing realization of this in Washington. The Trump administration's strategy for Central Asia published last February placed an important focus on Afghanistan's role in the region. Two of the six "policy objectives" directly deal with Afghanistan: "Expand and maintain support for stability in Afghanistan" and "Encourage connectivity between Central Asia and Afghanistan"

WHEN the international community talks about a "regional solution" for Afghanistan, mostly it is referring to the situation in Pakistan. Sometimes the regional solution is expanded to include India and China. Until recently, it was rare for the Central Asian republics to be discussed in this context. This is because many people fail to see Afghanistan for what it really is — a Central Asian country. Afghanistan is not part of the Middle East, and referring to it as part of the so-called "broader Middle East" is also misleading. At least half of the country is culturally, historically, economically and geographically part of Central Asia. Policymakers must recognize this.

While the current focus on Afghanistan is on peace talks taking place in Doha, longer-term economic prospects will be realized through greater economic integration with Central Asia. Connecting Afghanistan with the broader region and international markets is part of the solution to bring prosperity and stability to the country. Free trade has been shown to improve livelihoods and lift people out of poverty. As a recent World Trade Organization study concluded: "Trade liberalization helps poor countries to catch up with rich ones, and this faster economic growth helps to alleviate poverty." Landlocked Afghanistan suffers from a lack of connectivity with its neighbors, but this has not always been the case. For centuries, going back to the Middle Ages, what is now called Afghanistan was an integral part of regional trade along the Silk Road. Cities such as Balkh, Badakhshan, Bamiyan, Kabul and Herat were important trading stops on this trading route.

Thankfully, there is a growing recognition that Afghanistan's economic future is closely linked to Central Asia. Today, the country has the potential to occupy this important role again by serving as an important trade route not only east to west but also north to south. Regional trade and infrastructure projects in the pipeline could bring significant benefits to the Afghan economy and the region.

Currently, three rail links connect northern Afghanistan with Central Asia — one offers a connection with Uzbekistan and two connect with Turkmenistan. These links will play a major role in Afghanistan's participation in future regional transit projects.

There are also efforts to connect Afghanistan with Europe via Central Asia. In December 2017, Afghanistan, Turkmenistan, Azerbaijan, Georgia and Turkey signed the Lapis Lazuli Corridor Agreement. The goal of the corridor is to transport goods between Europe and Afghanistan in seven to nine days using a network of rail and ferries.

There are also important north-south projects in which Afghanistan serves as a key transit country connecting Central Asia with South Asia. The Central Asia-South Asia power project, also known as CASA-1000, was inaugurated last February in Afghanistan. This project will bring surplus electricity from Tajikistan and Kyrgyzstan to Afghanistan and Pakistan.

Another major scheme, the Trans-Afghanistan Pipeline project, could fundamentally change the natural gas connectivity of Central Asia. When complete, the proposed 1,700 km pipeline will carry natural gas from Turkmenistan to India, helping to end Russian and Chinese hegemony over the region's energy market. In addition, a fiber-optic cable will run alongside the pipeline.

Central Asian countries such as Kazakhstan and Uzbekistan understand the importance of stability and prosperity in Afghanistan. While Kazakhstan does not share a land border with Afghanistan, it is intertwined through historic trading routes that still link the two countries. Over the years, Kazakhstan has played a constructive role in Afghanistan. As the region's biggest economy and a secular republic, it has a direct interest in ensuring that Afghanistan becomes stable. Since the death of former President Islam

Karimov in September 2016, Uzbekistan has made gradual, but important, steps toward opening up and reforming its governance. Relations with neighboring countries, which have been strained for years, are beginning to improve. This new approach under the leadership of Karimov's successor, Shavkat Mirziyoyev, holds immense promise for the region, especially for Afghanistan.

The international community cannot give up on Afghanistan. It must find ways to help the country achieve not only security but also economic prosperity.

As the largest international donor, and the country that has been most involved in helping Afghanistan for the past two decades, the US has a role to play in facilitating economic relations between Afghanistan and Central Asia. Thankfully, there is a growing realization of this in Washington. The Trump administration's strategy for Central Asia published last February placed an important focus on Afghanistan's role in the region. Two of the six "policy objectives" directly deal with Afghanistan: "Expand and maintain support for stability in Afghanistan" and "Encourage connectivity between Central Asia and Afghanistan."

It is anyone's guess how the Doha peace talks will play out. If anything, the outlook is far from good following a recent spike in violence. But regardless, the international community cannot give up on Afghanistan. It must find ways to help the country achieve not only security but also economic prosperity. Helping Afghanistan and the Central Asian republics to integrate and realize their potential for trade and economic partnership can go a long way to achieving this goal. If history teaches us anything, it is that Afghanistan and the combined countries of Central Asia form an integral part of broader Eurasian trade and commerce. This is how it was in the past and, with the right approach, how it will be in the future.

Why COVID-19 is a threat to democracy

Cornelia Meyer

How govt measures are accepted by the public essentially boils down to the issue of trust in whether a government has the interests of all at heart. In Europe, people were broadly understanding during the first lockdown. They are more weary now, which is made worse by the fact that opposition parties now refuse to stand shoulder to shoulder with govts, as they did in March

THE coronavirus has the US, Latin America, India and Europe firmly in its grip. The number of cases in the US has surpassed 9 million, and over 235,000 people have died.

France, Spain, Germany, Belgium and others have re-imposed measures ranging from restrictions on movement to fully fledged closures, and on Saturday evening British Prime Minister Boris Johnson declared a second month-long lockdown for the whole of England. China has a handle on the virus and life has more or less returned to normal, but it is easier for an authoritarian regime to contain the spread of the pandemic. Strict enforcement measures go hand in hand with infringements of civil liberties unthinkable in a Western-style liberal democracy. South Korea, Taiwan and Japan have also fared reasonably well, but these democracies are underpinned by Confucian values of trust in the authority of elders. Everything is bigger and brasher in the US, and COVID-19 is no exception. President Donald Trump and challenger Joe Biden have vastly different approaches. Trump insists that closing down the economy would cause more damage than the virus. Biden emphasizes the loss of life and the apparent lack of consistent policies. Nothing illustrates their differences better than the dispute over facemasks. Trump sees in them an infringement of personal liberties, and his rallies are densely packed with unmasked supporters. Biden is never without a mask, and urges the administration to follow the science. In the middle is medical adviser Dr. Anthony Fauci, who explains why face coverings are important and warns that even if there is a vaccine in 2020, it will be the end of 2021 or even 2022 before America can return to normal. The schism between the candidates is reflected by protesters taking to the streets demanding to be liberated from the shackles of lockdowns. Things may be different in Europe, but not that different. There were violent demonstrations in Italy as the government tightened restrictions, and protests all through summer in Paris, London, Stuttgart, Berlin and Zurich.

The issue underlying the controversy over COVID-19 measures is about weighing up the relative status of two public goods: Personal freedom and public well-being.

COVID-19 poses a challenge to the civil liberties that are the cornerstone of any democracy. To make matters worse, the economically weak and marginalised groups suffer more than the affluent, which exacerbates the social divide. It is a home truth that democracies work best when the difference between rich and poor is small and the middle class is strong.

Western democracies rely on civil liberties, none more so than the US, where the right to the pursuit of happiness is enshrined in its Declaration of Independence. Many measures to combat the virus infringe on those civil liberties. This is where the quest for freedom may conflict with a government's duty to protect public safety and public health.

COVID-19 and the measures to fight it have also come at great expense to the global economy, from $11 trillion to $28 trillion depending on the source. Unemployment has soared, with the economically weakest hit the hardest. Low paid, high contact service sector jobs had to go first. Bloomberg estimates that the pandemic has so far cost more than 174 million jobs in the travel and tourism sector worldwide. New lockdowns will raise these numbers. Other frontline staff in supermarkets and health care may not lose their jobs, but they are at heightened risk of infection. This raises the question of how government will take care of the socially weak.

True, there have been generous support packages, but the question remains how long they can continue. Here, too, there is a political divide; the right argues for fiscal prudence and the left for social cohesion, whatever the cost. Nowhere is that more evident than in the tough negotiations about a further rescue package in the US.

How government measures are accepted by the public essentially boils down to the issue of trust in whether a government has the interests of all at heart. In Europe, people were broadly understanding during the first lockdown. They are more weary now, which is made worse by the fact that opposition parties now refuse to stand shoulder to shoulder with governments, as they did in March. The broader perspective is that COVID-19 poses a challenge to liberal democracies the world over. A 2020 Freedom House report on democracy under lockdown argues that COVID 19 precipitated a crisis resulting in the conditions for democracy and human rights worsening in 80 countries.

COVID-19 poses a challenge to the civil liberties that are the cornerstone of any democracy. To make matters worse, the economically weak and marginalised groups suffer more than the affluent, which exacerbates the social divide. It is a home truth that democracies work best when the difference between rich and poor is small and the middle class is strong. If anything, COVID-19 should serve as a rallying cry to take care of the weak, and of democracy, because we are all in this together.

Turning his guns towards India, PM Imran said that the most racist and Hindu supremacist government in history was in power in India. He said that the citizenship and registration laws were enacted to target Muslims in the country. PM Imran said that he could not stress enough the importance of a strong army for a nation's security. "Pakistan is secure today because of its armed forces," he said. "Our army is the main reason why we haven't suffered the same fate as many other Muslim countries."

He blamed India for promoting sectarian hate in Pakistan, saying that New Delhi was behind fanning hate between the Shia and Sunni sects in Pakistan. The prime minister felicitated Pakistan's intelligence agencies for rendering ineffective India's conspiracies to spread anarchy in the country. He blamed the Opposition for trying to establish the narrative that General Elections 2018 in Pakistan were rigged. After that, the prime minister said, they tried to blackmail him on the economy and the coronavirus situation.

Pak slams Modi on Pulwama remarks

"Today when I was watching the parade of officers here, an image came up in my mind... this image was of Pulwama attack. The country can never forget that when India was mourning the death of its sons... there were some people who were not a part of that grief. They were looking for selfish gain in the Pulwama attack," Modi had said. Pakistan said it was a "brazen attempt" by the Indian government to twist Chaudhry's remarks, clarifying that the minister was talking about the shooting down of two IAF jets on February 27, 2019. The Foreign Office blamed the BJP's "incurable obsession" with Pakistan, stating that it was the main reason why the right-wing party kept blaming Islamabad for its own failings and shortcomings. "It has been a part and parcel of the BJP's electoral strategy to raise the Pakistan 'bogey' in the attempt to galvanise voters' support, while seeking to divert public attention from their domestic and foreign policy failures," reads the statement by the Foreign Office.

against the hybrid government," she said, adding that it eyes to fulfil the dreams of the youngsters. Maryam, speaking on what true "slavery" is, said that it embodies itself in moves that "take away the right to speak, force people to bow down before the powerful, induce fear in people, restrict them from asking for their rights and ask them to remain silent". "People are given their rights as if it is charity and even those are provided after the powerful approve," she said. "People are sent to jails when they demand their rights - this is slavery," Maryam said. Shedding light on the Karachi incident, she said: "Slavery is when the inspector-general is abducted in Karachi and forced to sign the orders of (retired) Captain Safdar's arrest." Maryam went on to say that the Constitution was the book that contained the rights of the people. "It mentions what should and should not take place in Pakistan, what is right and what isn't." Urging the audience to read the Constitution, she said that even if a single demand of PML-N supremo Nawaz Sharif went against it, then people should not support him.

Trump, Biden barrel through key states before final vote

Using some of his most urgent language yet, Trump warned of "bedlam in our country" if no clear winner emerges quickly in the November 3 election, saying, without evidence, that it could take weeks to sort out a result and that "very bad things" could happen in the interim

NEW YORK: Donald Trump, challenger Joe Biden and their top surrogates were barreling through crucial states in the industrial Midwest and the coastal southeast on Saturday, in a frantic sprint to mobilize voters as they pressed their closing arguments with the US presidential election only days away. Using some of his most urgent language yet, Trump warned of "bedlam in our country" if no clear winner emerges quickly in the November 3 election, saying, without evidence, that it could take weeks to sort out a result and that "very bad things" could happen in the interim. Biden meantime told backers it was "time for Donald Trump to pack his bags and go home." Underscoring the high stakes - and the disruptive impact of the coronavirus pandemic - a record 90 million early votes have already been cast, as the bruising contest heads toward the biggest turnout in at least a century. The virus has killed nearly 230,000 Americans, ravaged the world's largest economy and was infecting record numbers of people across the US. Trump was focusing Saturday on the key battleground state of Pennsylvania - "the state where the story of American independence began," he said in the small city of Newtown, the first of four stops in that state amid a frenetic final sprint. Biden made his first joint appearance of the campaign with his former boss Barack Obama - probably the most popular Democrat in the country - in Flint, Michigan as they scramble to boost turnout in a state Trump carried by a razor-thin margin in 2016. Vice President Mike Pence, meantime, was campaigning in narrowly divided North Carolina while Biden's running mate Kamala Harris was in Florida, another vitally important swing state. Pennsylvania has emerged as one of the top prizes this year. In his motorcade en route to rural Bucks County, the president passed hundreds of supporters holding up a forest of pro-Trump signs. The crowd then booed reporters in trailing vehicles. In remarks at an event there, Trump lashed out at Biden, saying he would shut down the state's fossil-fuel industry. The president claimed credit for creating the "greatest economy in the history of this country

- the history of the world" - while "foreign nations are in freefall." Despite recent signs of recovery, however, millions remain jobless. And the race has been overshadowed by the surging pandemic, which had even sickened Trump and many members of his staff. More than 94,000 new infections were recorded Friday in the US - another new high - and total cases passed nine million, according to data from Johns Hopkins University. In stark contrast to Trump, who has belittled mask-wearing by Biden and others, the Democrat has scrupulously followed the guidance of public health experts.

After Biden and Obama appeared Saturday before a socially distanced drive-in rally in Flint, they made an unannounced stop in suburban Bloomfield Hills before heading later to Detroit to be joined by superstar singer Stevie Wonder. Biden leads in the state by nearly seven points, according to a RealClearPolitics average of polls. The state's 16 electoral votes could provide a sizable leap towards the 270 needed to win the White House. Trump, in eking out his 2016 victory, took advantage of low turnout rates among Michigan Blacks. As Biden campaigns with the nation's first Black president, he clearly hopes to change that.

Turkey quake death toll hits 55

As many as 104 people have been rescued from under the debris, while search and rescue activities still continue

ANKARA: The death toll from Friday's earthquake in Turkey's Aegean region has risen to 55, Health Minister Fahrettin Koca announced Sunday. At least 896 people were also wounded in the magnitude-6.6 quake that struck Izmir, Turkey's third largest city. As many as 104 people have been rescued from under the debris, while search and rescue activities still continue. The Disaster and Emergency Management Presidency said there have been 883 aftershocks with 42 stronger than magnitude-4.0, as of 12.30 a.m. local time (0930GMT). Among the hospitalized victims, 76% have so far been discharged, while eight people are in intensive care units, according to the minister. President Recep Tayyip Erdogan has said that new houses will be built for those whose homes have been destroyed "as soon as possible." Turkey is among the world's most seismically active zones as it is situated on several active fault lines. It has suffered devastating earthquakes in the past as well.

UN chief urges Armenia, Azerbaijan to hold talks

NEW YORK: UN Secretary-General Antonio Guterres remains "deeply concerned" over reports that hostilities in the Nagorno-Karabakh conflict zone are continuing to affect civilians, his spokesperson said on Saturday.

A statement issued by Spokesman Stephane Dujarric said that the UN chief condemns the violence and reiterated that "both sides have the obligation, under international humanitarian law, to take utmost care to spare and protect civilians and civilian infrastructure in the conduct of military operations." Nagorno-Karabakh lies within Azerbaijan but has been under the control of ethnic Armenian forces since they fought a war in the 1990s as the Soviet Union was dissolving. The latest conflict between the two countries, which began on 27 September, marked the worst escalation of fighting since the war's end and heightened fears of instability in the South Caucasus, a region that provides crucial transit routes for gas and oil to world markets.

In an effort to mediate the decades-long conflict, the Foreign Ministers of Armenia and Azerbaijan met in Geneva on 30 October for talks brokered by Russia, the United States and France - co-chairs of the Minsk Group of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE). News media reported that the talks concluded close to midnight with both sides agreeing not to deliberately target civilians or non-military objects, however, shortly after the pledge was announced, the truce was broken.

"The Secretary-General fully supports the call of the co-chairs OSCE Minsk Group for an immediate humanitarian ceasefire, as agreed in Moscow on 10 October, and confirmed subsequently in Paris on 17 October and in Washington D.C., on 25 October", the statement continued, noting that the call was again echoed by the co-chairs in Geneva. The UN chief called on the sides to "implement, in good faith and on an urgent basis, the concrete steps they agreed to take through the facilitation of the OSCE Minsk Group Co-Chairs, as well as their previous commitments".

He also urged the warring parties to continue engaging in "substantive dialogue" and, with the co-chairs, to intensify their efforts to "reach a peaceful and sustainable settlement of the conflict".

US election outcome and ties with EU

Ruling that European subsidies to Airbus were illegal, the World Trade Organization gave Donald Trump the green light to apply punitive tariffs worth some US $7.5 billion

DNA

BRUSSELS: Can the European economy expect any clouds to lift after the US elections? Described by Donald Trump as the United States leading commercial foe, the European Union has paid a high price for his America First policies. How much more would the EU stand to lose from his re-election - and how much could it gain from a victory by Democrat candidate Joe Biden? In the light of the changing face of transatlantic relations, nothing can be taken for granted - that's what the people in this edition of Unreported Europe tell us, starting in the heart of France's vineyards. Wine is one of a number of European food and drink products targeted by punitive tariffs. Set in between the Burgundy and Beaujolais regions, wine producer and trader Maison Jean Loron send a quarter of their exports for sale in the American market. But business got much harder a year ago, when

French, German and Spanish wine exporters were hit by a new 25% tax on their exports to the US. Preserving market shares in the US was crucial in the face of competition from American and Chilean wines, but also Italian wines, not hit by the tariffs. Philippe Bardet, Maison Jean Loron's CEO, said their options were limited: "We made a decision that hit us in the wallet: to lower our prices to offset the taxes applied by the United States. That (figure) has run into several hundred thousand Euros. That's a lot to us, it's our profit for the year. We (now) sell for nothing in the United States. So we hope there will be a way out of this, we're not sure." I asked him if he thought the situation would change if Democratic Party candidate Joe Biden won instead: "Obviously, a change of President would be a good sign. But whatever happens, the situation isn't going to resolve itself in the short term." Exporters are the collateral victims of a long-running battle between Air-bus and its American competitor, Boeing. Ruling that European subsidies to Airbus were illegal, the World Trade Organization gave Donald Trump the green light to apply punitive tariffs worth some US $7.5 billion. The response came last October: the WTO authorised the EU to impose tariffs on US goods worth $4 billion in retaliation for illegal subsidies to Boeing. When asked who the US' biggest commercial foe was in an interview with CBS News in 2018, Trump had responded that they had "a lot of foes. I think the European Union is a foe. What they do to us in trade. They have really taken advantage of us." These comments came shortly after the EU imposed new taxes on US steel and aluminium exports, as well as a number of iconic American products such as Harley Davidson motorbikes and Levi jeans. This in itself had been a response to the US tariffs imposed earlier on European steel and aluminium products. The tug of war is not expected to lose momentum if Donald Trump wins the presidential election on November 3. Valdis Dombrovskis, the EU Commission's Executive Vice President, and Commissioner for Trade, made it clear to me that if negotiations couldn't solve trade disputes, the EU would definitely act: "Our trade and investment relationship remains the largest and most important in the world. It's important to continue to engage (and) to continue to develop our transatlantic relations, because when the EU and US works together, we can also be a force for good in the world. "But we have also been clear that when the US is taking unilateral steps, the EU is going to respond in a proportionate way. "So although we do not intend to escalate the situation, we have to defend ourselves." Despite Donald Trump's punitive tax policies, the European union's trade surplus for goods with the United States has actually risen consistently since he came into power in January 2017: A new offensive is expected if the outgoing President wins a second term; threats of a 25% tax on European car imports have loomed since EU leaders announced they would impose digital service taxes on American tech giants. The plans were suspended until the end of the year, the deadline for an agreement to be found. The issue is just one of the contentious topics that are not expected to simply go away, whatever the outcome of the presidential election, according to experts on both sides of the Atlantic. "I think the overall tone of the relations would improve dramatically under a Biden administration. "But there are other issues which are (still) going to be very, very difficult: this digital tax issue - if anything, the Democrats are more beholden to the Silicon Valley digital giants like Google and Facebook than the Republicans are. "The Boeing-Airbus (conflict) is not going to go away.

England to lockdown again

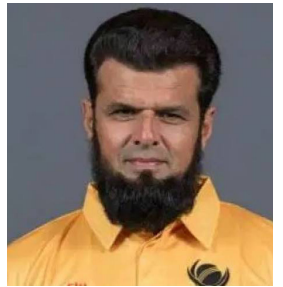

DNA

LONDON: Britain's Prime Minister Boris Johnson announced on Saturday a new four-week lockdown in England, which will join several European countries in imposing the measure for a second time since the coronavirus pandemic began, as Slovakia took a different tack and began testing its entire population. The list of countries on the continent re-implementing stringent new restrictions on people's lives is fast expanding as Europe experiences a dizzying spike in Covid-19 cases, leading to widespread exasperation and sometimes violent protests. Just minutes after Johnson's announcement, Portugal's Prime Minister Antonio Costa announced a partial lockdown for his country, with 70 percent of the population going back into lockdown. Also on Saturday, Austria brought in a second lockdown of its own, while Greece declared a partial one. The new measures came just a day after France started its second lockdown and Belgium said it would tighten its measures.

Aleem Dar sets new record

his 210th appearance as an umpire for an one-day international (ODI) cricket match when he turned up for the second ODI between the green shirts and Zimbabwe.

Dar's 210th appearance set the record of him supervising the highest number of ODI matches in the world. With a new feather in his cap, he beat the 209-match feat held by South African Rudi Koertzen. Before today's match - the second ODI between Pakistan and Zimbabwe - started, he was seen excitedly clutching his souvenir following a brief ceremony at the Rawalpindi Cricket Stadium. Last year, Dar set the record of supervising the most Test matches when he stood in his 129th Test - played between Australia and New Zealand in December. Born on June 6, 1968, in Jhang, Aleem Dar is a member of the Elite Panel of ICC Umpires. He had also played first-class cricket before becoming an umpire. Dar has also won the David Shepherd Trophy as the best umpire of the year for three years in a row from 2009 to 2011, after being nominated twice in 2005 and 2006.

Displaced Syrians fear spread of coronavirus

QAH: Hassan Sweidan is terrified he will catch Covid-19 in the overcrowded displacement camp in northwest Syria he calls home, even more so as medical staff in the region have become sick. Humanitarian workers fear any further rise in novel coronavirus cases would be disastrous in northwest Syria, where almost 1.5 million people live in overcrowded camps or shelters, often with poor access to running water. In an informal settlement in Idlib, the country's last major rebel stronghold, Sweidan said he and other displaced Syrians did not stand much chance against the disease. "We live in a camp all crammed in together. If someone talks to his family, all the neighbours can hear it," said Sweidan, who is in his forties and has an existing health condition. If someone gets sick, "it's hardly the disease's fault," the father of six added. In the encampment in Qah, a few makeshift solar panels shimmer on the canvas roofs of endless tiny breeze-block rooms where families have settled after being uprooted by war. Resting after helping a friend build a small room to serve as a shop, Sweidan said he hopes he does not have to take anyone in his family to the local hospital. - APP

Merkel's CDU to elect new leader in mid-January

BERLIN: German Chancellor Angela Merkel's CDU party will elect its new leader in mid-January after a planned vote in early December was pushed back because of a surge in coronavirus infections. The three hopefuls for the top job in the Christian Democratic Union had put forward the date, party general secretary Paul Ziemiak said in a tweet late Saturday. "This agreement is a strong signal for cohesion in our party," he wrote after talks with outgoing party chief Annegret Kramp-Karrenbauer. North Rhine-Westphalia state premier Armin Laschet, corporate lawyer Friedrich Merz and foreign affairs expert Norbert Röttgen are vying for the post. The candidates have proposed an online congress if meeting in person were to be impossible because of restrictions to curb coronavirus transmission. The chief of the CDU traditionally leads it and its smaller Bavarian sister party the Christian Social Union to the polls. The chosen candidate would have a strong claim on the post of chancellor and be in pole position to replace Merkel should the conservative bloc win next year's election. Merkel protégé Kramp-Karrenbauer took over as leader of the party in 2018, after the veteran chancellor said she would not seek a new mandate at next year's polls. But the race for the party's top job was thrown wide open when Kramp-Karrenbauer resigned just a few months into the post over her handling of a regional election scandal. - APP

JI women condemn blasphemy in France

ISLAMABAD: Secretary General of Women's Wing Jamaat-e-Islami Pakistan Durdana Siddiqui has condemned the recent wave of Islamophobia and blasphemy in France. Talking to App, she said that blasphemy against the Prophet of Islam and their hatred against the tenets of Islam have exposed their ugly faces. She said that let France know that every child, youth, old and woman of the Ummah knows how to protect the honor of their Prophet more than their own lives. In a statement condemning the publication of the insulting caricatures in a French magazine and then its official patronage, she said these seditionists have so much courage because unfortunately most of the rulers of the Muslim world have lost their religious pride and are unable to fulfill their duty. 'I understand Muslims anger'

PARIS: French President Emmanuel Macron said he can understand Muslims being shocked by cartoons of the prophet Muhammad but that he can never accept them being used to justify violence. The French leader spoke to media in which he sought to clarify his position on Islam and defuse tensions that flared following the killing of a teacher who showed caricatures of Muhammad to his pupils. "I understand and respect that we can be shocked by these caricatures. I will never accept that we can justify physical violence for these caricatures and I will always defend in my country the freedom to say, to write, to think, to draw," Macron said. He emphasised that the French press is free to publish what it wants and that what is released is therefore not the official position of the government. "But does the president think this right should be removed? The answer is no because this is the right of the French people."

COVID-19: smaller Turkey on Christmas this time

DNA

LONDON: Feeding time for the turkeys on a farm in Dorset in England, only this year they might not have to gobble down so much. Thanks to COVID-19 restrictions on large gatherings, organic turkey farmer Mark Chilcott is anticipating an increase in demand for smaller birds this Christmas, although he knows it's a gamble. "If we run out of small sizes then people have to have crowns or joints or half turkeys basically nothing else we can do," explained Mark. "But we expect to sell out easily this year, demand's really quite good...as far as sales go we're ahead of last year." Many people have predicted the demise of the turkey on festive menus in recent years, but producers say that's not what they've found.

Quality not quantity is also the name of the game at Copas Turkeys in southern England they go for happier, stress-free birds, and argue that that's the way to keep up the tradition. "You know as well as I do that there's veganism, vegetarianism is becoming much more popular, but what we're very proud to say is we have a couple of customers that are vegetarian that come back to us and eat our product at Christmas," said the farm's sales manager, Verity Copas. Total in Papua New Guinea: Dialogue, consultation and empowerment. Valorization of natural resources can be a decisive contributor to the improvement of the living conditions in developing countries. Georgia opposition calls for protests

TBILISI: Georgia's opposition called Sunday for mass protests after the ruling Georgian Dream party claimed victory in a tightly contested parliamentary election. Exiled ex-president and opposition leader Mikheil Saakashvili accused Georgian Dream of falsifying Saturday's vote and urged his supporters to take to the streets. The vote could spark another political crisis in the ex-Soviet republic of four million, where elections are often followed by accusations of fraud and mass demonstrations. Saakashvili's United National Movement party (UNM) was already calling for a protest rally Sunday afternoon outside parliament. Independent local election observers also said there had been multiple irregularities. It was unclear whether the opposition would be able to mobilise large numbers of supporters, with many Georgians weary of political instability and worried by the coronavirus pandemic. With votes from nearly 92 percent of precincts counted, Georgian Dream had won 48 percent of the proportional vote, against 45.5 percent for opposition parties, the Central Election Commission said. The proportional vote decides 120 of the 150 seats in the legislature. MUNAZA KAZMI

For many Shah Rukh Khan is an inspiration while for others, he is a living legend, and for me he is life, therefore on this birthday I have planned to pay him a tribute, as the actor completes yet another milestone, 55 successful years of life. Shahrukh Khan also known as King Khan reasoning his immense popularity was born to a Muslim family on 2nd November 1965 in Delhi, India. After graduating in economics from Hans Raj College, he pursued master's degree in mass communication, but sooner he entered in film industry through theatre and television. His first on screen work was of Fauji 1988 and Circus 1989, which earned him immediate recognition. Khan's breakthrough movie was Deewana 1992, that resulted in turning point of his career. Khan's earlier triumph was built upon antihero portrayals and obsessive lover such as Baazigar 1993 and Darr 1993. In both movies he created his own version of villain, the beloved villain! The one which still rhythm in our ears as KKrian and without whose melodies our first love would feel incomplete. However later he assumed the role of hero and produced blockbusters as Dilwale Dulhania le jayenge 1995, Dil to pagalhai 1997, Karan Arjun 1998, and Kuchkuchhotahi 1998. These movies made 90's a golden era, then Devdas 2002, Kal ho naa ho 2003, Veer Zaara 2004, of which I would say, "Shah-rukhh taught world what true love is", in fact the love which only Shah-rukhh can do. 22 years in prison for the esteem of beloved, breathing his Along Shahrukh is the only Bollywood actor to receive 3 international doctorates.
